

Musicians Launch Global Online Effort to Promote Musicians with "Challenges"

When musician Andrew Hewitt made the trek from his native Australia to the U.S., one important meeting he had was with fellow musician Dom Famularo. The purpose of the meeting was to explore how they might establish a global organization to promote and support musicians with disabilities from all over the world.

The result of that meeting? Can-Do Musos, became the brainchild of Hewitt, Famularo, and fellow musicians David Segal from Connecticut, and Mike Mignogna from Tennessee. Their philosophy is having a "Can-Do" attitude is the first step toward success.

"As our mission statement says, Can Do Musos want to provide guidance and hope to all musicians with challenges," Hewitt stated in a press release. "Music is empowering and has no limitations and everyone should have a chance at their dreams."

Can Do Musos recently launched their website <http://www.candomusos.com> and encourages musicians with "challenges" to visit the page as well as join them on Facebook and Twitter to be part of the effort to change music.

"On our website, we use the word 'Challenges,'" Hewitt pointed out. "We feel that disability quite often gets misinterpreted as an inability. People with challenges have passion, can be empowered and want to succeed."

The organization is looking for passionate musicians with challenges to profile on their website and be part of this unique new organization. So far, the group has attracted submissions from Australia, Canada, United Kingdom, United States, and Venezuela.